Jack Munroe will go to New York and arrange a match with Tom Sharkey. Munroe says he wants a fight with a good man before he tackles Jeffries for the championship. Sharkey can give it to him. Munroe will also have a chance to arrange a match with Kid McCoy.

The next match of importance to be arranged will probably be between Tommy Ryan, the middle weight champion, and Philadelphia Jack O'Brien. The International Club, of Fort Erie, has offered them a purse of $6,500 for a twenty-round bout to take place Jan. 23. It is suggested that the purse be divided, $5,000 to the winner and $1,500 to the loser. "Parson" Davies has deposited a $2,500 check in the hands of "Honest John" Kelly to back up his challenge on behalf of Kid Broad for a match at 126 pounds with Young Corbett or Terry McGovern. Davies wants the fight to be for a wager of $10,000, and he is ready to name the club and the spot where the fight may be brought off. It must be a battle to a finish. Davies has taken command of the pugilistic situation at Salt Lake City and he hopes to pull off the proposed battle at that place. This seems to be a good chance for McGovern or Corbett to get on a fight if they can't get together themselves. Benny Yanger and Tim Callahan, who fought in Chicago a short time ago, have

THE WHITE ELEPHANT.

Mistaken Impression Regarding Its Place in Siamese Religion.

Washington Star.

"There is a mistaken impression that the white elephant, the shang phoouk, is worshiped by the Buddhists of Siam as a said a missionary who has recently returned from the Orient. "The Buddhists do not recognize a material God in any form and are shocked at the American idea that they worship an elephant. There is, however, some approach to worship in their reverence for white animals, particularly the elephant, monkey, dove, sparrow, stork and swan. The reason of this reverence is that under the Buddhist religion each successive Buddha is supposed to have passed through a series of transmigrations and in turn occupied the forms of white animals of a certain class. The white elephant ranks first because it is believed to be the temporary dwelling place of the soul of some great personage, a king or great gen-

The elephant is received with great ceremony on the way to the capital, and a path is cut through the forest for its convenient passage. At every stopping place attendants sing and dance, play musical instruments and give exhibitions of skill for the entertainment of the elephant.

"Seventy miles from the capital the King, his court, priests and great personages, with musicians and cannon, meet the elephant and conduct him to his stable, which is a palace. The ceremonies continue for a week or ten days, and consist of interesting details. He is knighted, anointed, his tusks are capped with gold and he is given a title. Festivities and entertainand at the expiration of the allotted time he is conducted to his magnificent apartments within the King's palace. Attendants are given him and when he is given a bath he is fanned with fans of gold. During life the white elephant is the leading figure in all state occasions and is staall times his food is selected with the greatest care and he is given the most tender sprouts the country affords, grass, sugar cane, plantains and wheat made into cakes, and his drink is highly perfumed." RECOLLECTIONS OF THE ALCOTTS Interesting Pictures of the Family as Known at Harvard. New England Magazine. In the summer of 1843 there arrived at Harvard a group of people who aroused the Yankee curiosity of the inhabitants of prised sixteen people, including Bronson Alcott and nine other men, Mrs. Alcott, Miss Anna Page and the four Alcott children. A picturesque sidehill farm in the school district of Harvard known as Still River North became their home, and it soon appeared that they had gathered there in order to carry out the theories of transcendentalism then prevailing in certain quarters. Miss Alcott, in her "Transcendental Wild Oats," has thus described the exodus to Harvard: "On the 1st day of June, 1843, a large wagon, drawn by a small horse and containing a motley load, went lumbering over certain New England hills, with the pleasing accompaniments of wind, rain and hail. A serene man with a serene child upon his knee was driving, or rather being driven, for the small horse had it all his own way. Behind a small boy, embracing a bust of Socrates, was an energetic-looking woman, with a benevolent brow, satirical mouth and eyes full of hope and courage. A baby reposed upon her lap, a mirror leaned against her knee, a basket of provisions danced about her feet, and she struggled with a large, unruly umbrella, with which she tried to cover every one but herself. Twilght began to fall, and the rain came down in a despondent drizzle, but the calm man gazed as tranquilly into the fog as if he beheld a radiant ow of promise spanning the gray sky. "Mr. Alcott was too much engaged philosophizing and gardening to share in such merry-makings," writes Mr. Clark, but a lady, who was in those days one of the Still River schoolgirls, tells me of one occasion when he did attend a picnic at the schoolhouse. I have an impression that it was held on the Fourth of July, and very likely Mr. Alcott had been asked to speak. One can well believe that the doughnuts. cold meat, pickles, cakes and pies usually served on such occasions were little to his taste; and, indeed, when there were passed

"Another tale is related by the schoolmate who was Louisa's most intimate Still River friend. Calling at the Alcotts' one day, she found Louisa in a little hall chamber, where she had been sentenced to remain till she was sorry for speaking disrespectfully to her mother; at present she was not sorry. She confided to her friend, who remarked there, she had thought it a good time to oil her hair, which she had been doing, most lavishly, with some of poor Mrs. Alknows what is best for those around it. Its | cott's whale oil! A recollection caused the prisoner shortly to declare she could stay indoors no longer. Deaf to her visitor's remonstrances, she explained that the day before she had accidentally killed a spider in the pasture, and must needs go and look at his monument, which she had erected. So the two little girls crept softly downstairs and out through the garden, successfully avoiding the notice of Mr. Alcott, who was busy hoeing. The monument proved to be a shingle fixed in the ground, bearing an epitaph appropriate to the un-fortunate spider. All this seems very much like a chapter from one of Miss Alcott's stories." The volume contains several illustrations of Harvard scenes.

HOW WAS COAL FORMED? Consideration of One of the Great Processes of Nature.

Literary Digest

Some interesting and mysterious points in the history of coal formation are dis-cussed by Dr. J. F. Hoffmann, of Berlin, in the Zeitschrift fur Angewandte Chemie. Although authorities are agreed that coal process by which it came to be what it is are by no means clear. Dr. Hoffmann an important factor. According to a contributor to London Engineering, who discusses Dr. Hoffmann's paper, the popular view of the formation of coal may be summarized as follows: Certain plants or trees grow in morasses; they decay and sink, more plants grow on the first layer, and sink in their turn. The weighted down residue decomposes through the influence of microbes, with the generation of methane and carbonic acid; and when the decomposed mass is afterward exposed to high pressure we find, according to the age of the deposit, peat, lignite, coal, or anthracite; graphite does not appear to have the same genesis as coal. He goes on to say: "Some weak points of the popular view are pretty apparent. If time and pressure be the main factors which decide the character of the coal, then we should find anthracite in the oldest geological formations and peat in the most recent. But lignite occurs in the Devonian, and we know historically of the change of mine timber into passing into coal. Further, anthracite forming the bottom layer should contain most ashes, and, so far as actual experiments can teach us, the very highest pressures of 20,000 atmospheres do not cause vegetable fiber to become coal.' Dr. Hoffman raises some other points. He would distinguish three periods in the formation of coal. First, a period of microbe activity, a fermentation, so to say; then a period of decay, and, finally, the carbonization period proper. Mere heat does not change wood into coal, though we cite when we gradually raise the temperaheating and ignition often observed in vegetable products, and he studies the problem thermochemically. Hay is very apt to heat in a warm, damp condition and to burst into flames when air gains access. Wet

A mill containing grain and flour was burned down in Berlin some years ago; the fire was ascribed to spontaneous combustion; and in some big lumps of smouldering grain which had been thrown into the river Hoffmann discovered layers resembling lignite, coal and anthracite in this sequence. In all these cases moisture favors the combustion or the fungous growth starting it. With coal this is not so, because there is no organized fiber and no fungous growth. The writer in Engineering says in concluding his review of the flax is notoriously dangerous, and so are

"Geologically we have reason to believe that the formation of the coal beds was followed by violent titanic convulsions, during which the heat and pressure may have coacted. * * * By spontaneous combus tion some seam would become charred; the heat would be communicated to an other seam and so on, so that the coa beds of considerable extent would be produced. But Hoffmann himself sees that we do not understand, on these lines, how it is that coal beds consist of fairly uniform coal-coal, anyhow, not lignite- all through down to their extreme veins. We do not arrive at any final conclusion as to the genesis of coal, therefore, and the chief interest of Dr. Hoffmann's paper lies in the fact that he draws attention to the in fluence of spontaneous combustion."
